“Reading Party” Video

September 11

Let’s start our journey with some communal reading—many of you are in a living-learning community after all. And even for those who aren’t officially in the LLC, you’re still in the LC (the “learning” one).

Read Together

Self-organize into groups of three (3) or more and arrange to read the assigned chapters together. You don’t have to be constantly together for absolutely every single page of reading, but afford yourselves enough time to capture some content and react to it as a group.

^^^^ This is the crux of the assignment. The actual submission (on the right) serves simply as an artifact to show that you did the work, even if it only represents a fraction of the time involved.

Reading

Read The Craft of Research Chapter 1 “Thinking in Print: The Uses of Research, Public and Private,” Chapter 2 “Connecting with Your Reader: Creating a Role for Yourself and Your Readers,” Chapter 3 “From Topics to Questions,” and Chapter 4 “From Questions to a Problem” by this week.

(yes, it seems like a lot, but it reads quite quickly, with a conversational, friendly voice)

Capture the Occasion

To preserve at least some portion of your communal reading/learning sessions, record, edit, and upload a video of your group containing at least the following:

- Each individual member of the group should choose something from the reading and provide some commentary about it, for around 30–90 seconds each
- The overall group should devote a minute or so discussing/reflecting on/arguing over a chosen portion of the reading

Thus, a group of three (3) would end up with roughly a five-minute video; five people would go to seven-ish minutes; ten people will probably end up with 15 minutes, etc. As stated on the left, the video isn’t meant to be a comprehensive work product, but just a little snapshot of what you did together with the material.

The video doesn’t have to be too polished or spruced up, but if you have the time and interest to give it some pizzazz, then feel free.

Submission

Even though there will be only one video per group, for consistency, please submit the same link to Brightspace as individuals. This way, everyone is equally accountable for the submission, and will not need to rely on another group mate to turn something in on time.
